

“Anybody in the legal community will get a tremendous charge out of this book. That goes double for anybody who has also been in the Navy.”

– Richard A. Reid, Esquire

“I read your story about ‘The Picnic’ and absolutely loved it. I too had a yia yia like Thea Maria, who could walk across mountainsides with incredible speed, even in her 80s. Kytherians in Australia are absolutely going to LOVE your stories.”

– George Poulos (Sydney, Australia)

Still-practicing attorney Harris “Bud” George shares memories of growing up in the Baltimore Greek community, his Atlantic-Pacific adventures in the U.S. Navy, and his experiences practicing law in Towson, Maryland for 45 years.

Vasili pulled to a stop in front of three small houses and said that anyone wanting to stretch should do so. My nephews and I emerged from the bus. I saw three old men drinking coffee around a small table on a stone ledge outside one of the houses. Recognizing me as an American, they smiled. I sauntered up to them, and, endeavoring to make polite conversation, in my broken Greek, I asked them whether this was the road to Karava. The oldest of the three smiled even more broadly and said, “Monsieur, this is not Paris. There is only one road to Karava.”
